

HMU's network provisioning and engineering practices are designed to enable its customers to receive the speeds to which they subscribe. However, it is important to note that many factors beyond HMU's control can affect the actual speeds customers are able to receive to their devices, including:

- The capability of end user devices (i.e. a computer, smartphone, or tablet), including factors such as age, software and operating system versions, the presence of viruses and malware, and the number of simultaneous applications running.
- Home network (Wi-Fi) connections, which may be slower than wired connections.
- Congestion on websites visited, including high demand by multiple simultaneous users.
- Fluctuations in latency within connecting networks outside of HMU's network, such as gaming servers.
- Capability of hardware used to connect to internet service (modems, routers, gateways, and associated firmware).
- Other unforeseen circumstances regarding user owned hardware, software or user initiated configurations or applications.
