

HMU's network provisioning and engineering practices are designed to enable its customers to receive the internet speeds to which they subscribe. However, it is important to note that many factors beyond HMU's control can affect the actual speeds customers are able to receive on their devices, including:

- The capability of end user devices (i.e. a computer, smartphone, or tablet), including factors such as age, software and operating system versions, the presence of viruses and malware, and the number of applications running simultaneously.
- Home network (Wi-Fi) connections, which may be slower than wired connections.
- Congestion on websites visited, including high demand by multiple simultaneous users.
- Fluctuations in latency within connecting networks outside of HMU's network, such as gaming servers.
- The capability of hardware (i.e. modems, routers, gateways, and associated firmware) used to connect to internet service.
- Other unforeseen circumstances regarding user owned hardware, software or user initiated configurations or applications.
